In fact, it is more than a game. WedliActivists is an educational tool to help make people better cyber citizens. It’s designed for anyone who wants to address the question of online hate speech with young people aged 10 and up. It was created by four young Belgians with support from the Council of Europe for human rights.

The game is designed to:
- Make young people aware of issues around hate speech, as well as the right to freedom of expression and its limits
- Stimulate their critical thinking and encourage discussion about the kinds of discriminatory speech so readily available on the Internet
- Encourage responsible behaviour that fosters respect for human rights
- Motivate young people to be active citizens, online and offline

Because it combines the classic game board with Internet protocols and social media, WedliActivists is a sure-fire way to capture the attention of young people. Plus, it encourages interactions among the players and with the facilitator. Players must work out the path that will allow them to find the password to clean up a computer infected with a hate virus. The game involves dates from history, surprising screen captures to read, recipes, and more. It’s lots of fun and highly educational.
